10. Alirio Calle, Luis (Yarumal, Antioquia, 1956). PECADOS ORIGINALES. Bogotá: Editorial Universidad de Antioquia, 2020. 210p., wrps. New. Paperback. ISBN: 9789587149883.

"Pecados Originales" is noted for its excellent literary quality. The narrative voice is strong, it does not waver, which allows the reader to immediately establish a pact between what he reads and his interiority. The situations are very well worked, despite the brevity required by the story. The world of the characters that populate the pages of the work is revealed with clarity and plausibility. The physical environment is well described, and there is diversity, since each of the environments in the stories has its own characteristics. The dialogues, which are not numerous, leave aside any affectation to focus on the idea that they want to express in a natural way. The work is distinguished by a Spanish that, in addition to being correct, is elegant, adjusting well to the different themes and situations.

It should be noted that the sexual nature of the stories contained here, a difficult matter to work on and even more so when it comes to a long book, is characterized by its delicate approach, without falling into the explicit and at the same time avoiding any type of self-censorship. In this sense, the stories enjoy a freedom that allows the reader to also exercise theirs.

(76858) $34.90

11. Almeida, Germano. EL TESTAMENTO DEL SEÑOR NAPUMOCENO DA SILVA ARAÚJO. Bogotá: Universidad de los Andes, Facultad de Artes y Humanidades, Departamento de Humanidades y Literatura, Ediciones Uniandes, 2020. 146p., bibl., wrps. New. Paperback. ISBN: 9789587748116.

Traducción, prólogo y notas: Jordi Cerdà

"El Testamento del Señor Napumoceno da Silva Araújo" takes place in the most decisive stages of the history of Cape Verde. Through the testament, dated by the protagonist on November 30, 1974 and opened ten years later, we can discover the vicissitudes of this African archipelago, before, during and after its independence process.

12. Álvarez Gardeazábal, Gustavo. EL TITIRITERO. Cali: Universidad del Valle, 2019. 301p., wrps. New. Paperback. ISBN: 9789585533352.

In "El Titiritero" the plot is organized like a puzzle and the pieces are delivered "didactically" by this voice which is, in turn, a guide. The novel wants to show the ABC of the structure, reveal a trade and expose that it is not an indefinable something "inspired by the muses", but rather a series of steps that go from observing reality to ordering it properly, always manipulating her. It is intended to show how a narrative can be structured around some facts that leads us to them, although this narrative is sustained and crossed by the writer's imagination.

(77609) $29.90

13. Álvarez Gardeazábal, Gustavo. EL ÚLTIMO GAMONAL. Cali: Universidad del Valle, 2019. 171p., wrps. New. Paperback. ISBN: 9789585599314.

"El Último Gamonal" is a novel written by the Colombian Gustavo Álvarez Gardeazábal, tells the story of a landowner and conservative chief, Don Leonardo, who through terror and blackmail (or perhaps through a benevolent and friendly image) imposes his whims and determines the historical course that the small population of Trujillo is forced to follow. Don Leonardo is one of those men who are called "gamonal"; someone who, through his peculiar and astute way of seeing things and assuming them, will gain ground in the commercial, social, cultural fields and, as a fundamental fact, in the political field. This is why neither the military themselves, nor the politicians, nor the ecclesiastics will dare to oppose or confront him (at least initially). What happens in Trujillo is determined by what his gamonal decides. Thus, social customs, village lifestyles and matters related to agriculture do not take a course that we could call natural, but are subordinated to what an inquisitive mind wants them to be. Whatever assessment can be made of this is something that certainly matters little, due to the fact that what matters more is what the gamonal has said or desired.

Those were the nostalgic time, times of a harsh reality. The main character will remind the reader of the character Melquiades from "One Hundred Years of Solitude" and his particular way of representing that the impossible could be achieved. "When The Leaves Fall" was born in the middle of a war, of the silent was that takes place in the country where the author lives. It is a place where everyone knows the people who kill, but they keep it quiet, they don't want to see it. In the country where the silences shout what the darkness hides and whose only illusion is that each star in the sky keeps the evidence of what happened.

19. Araújo Vélez, Fernando (Cartagena). AUNQUE ME MUERA A LA IZQUIERDA. Medellín: Sílabo Editores, (Colección: Trazos y Sílabas), 2020. 440p., wrps. New. Paperback. ISBN: 9789585516328.

Verónica Domínguez, a little girl, looks at the cover of the Beatles and from there she falls in love with their songs and at the same time begins her fight against the institution, the power of the state and oppression in the 80s, next to her is Martín Enciso, a Beatles collector who teaches him about revolution, disillusionment, and injustice.

The main and female character in this fight is what excites me the most, Fernando Araújo breaks with stereotypes and shows us a strong and fighting woman who renounces conservative ideas imposed by family and systems. Reading "Aunque Me Muera a la Izquierda" is knowing and identifying with each of the minorities. It is a book full of emotions, it is surrounded by social phrases such as poetry by Anna Ajmatova, fragments of Silvio Rodríguez, thoughts of Che Guevara or Fidel Castro, the lyrics make you angry, hurt, happy and eager to fight for a collective cause.

The Catholic Church is in the eye of the hurricane due to the increasingly frequent cases of abuse against minors, allegedly committed by priests. That is the objective of "Let the children come to me", a more than timely book to put on the table a global phenomenon that has forced the Vatican to adopt in-depth measures to confront a practice that must disappear at the root. Resourceful reporter Juan Pablo Barrientos followed a lead that appeared in the credits of the 2016 Oscar-winning film Spotlight, which led him to the Archdiocese of Medellín, where he uncovered numerous complaints against priests. Impressive accounts of the cases already documented that ended in the separation of the Church from those responsible.

A radio show for insomniac listeners and night workers eager to win a couple of movie tickets. An anonymous poet whose only wish is to captain a sailboat across the Pacific. The noisy and incomprehensible conversation of a group of blind children playing in the pool. All these scenes, unconnected in appearance, are joined by the passionate search for poetry in the corners of everyday life, in perceptible silences and in ordinary words. After all, the field is not so green is a set of poetic chronicles built through a lens of curiosity about the insignificant, but also about language itself. With magnetic prose, each short story draws palpable images of memories, trips and casual encounters that explore the nooks and crannies of the momentary and question everything that is assumed to be conventional. By focusing on what is usually ignored, Víctor Gaviria vindicates the lyricism inherent in the stillness of existence through reflections that invoke the civil poetry of Evtushenko, the orthographic rebellion of Helí Ramírez and the melancholic nothingness of Pessoa. These narratives reflect the brilliance of static moments and invite the infinite search for everyday poetry.

Paperback. ISBN: 9789587749809.

This work gives much more than what it promises in the title. Analyzing the magazine Proa, it focuses on the leading role of periodicals in the Colombian architectural debate. Highly relevant data on buildings, architects and urban programs are provided, highlighting the need to analyze architectural advertising not as something merely anecdotal, but as an essential component of both the relationship between architecture, the city and the industrial fabric, as well as the imaginary architecture of a society. In this sense, his study is part of a recent but thriving line of research in contemporary architecture, which has already produced notable results in various countries on the study of the relationship between advertising and architecture.

The book offers numerous partial contributions in aspects such as the urban history of Bogotá in the middle decades of the 20th century, modern "domesticity" in the printed media, the monographic study of the main architecture offices, its business structure and the image with which that architects presented their works and themselves in front of society. The catalog that constitutes the second part of the work offers material that can be used in future research, as well as a methodological model for similar studies in other countries. The book thus unravels a collective view that correctly identifies the essential aspects, which includes important partial contributions, but which ends up composing a global investigation in which the whole is far superior to the mere sum of the parts.

The absence of ghostly adventures in my vigils could have led me to the easy –and irrational– attitude of denying their existence. As far as I know, there are ghosts that do not recognize the existence of human beings, possibly for the same reason, because they have never seen an individual of our species. There may be the rare case of ghosts that accept the existence of human beings and do not manifest themselves to them simply out of fear. The history of ghosts can be recounted according to the prevailing religions, according to the customs of each era, according to the philosophers. You can mention the way scientists have treated ghosts (perhaps not taking into account that there were already many ghosts before the first scientist existed), and one gets to the point that, Ghosts having always been present in the oral tradition of all peoples and having supplied these narratives to the greatest classics, the most appropriate territory of ghosts is literature. To begin with, no one there is going to ask them if they really exist, or anything like that. And what literature does is give them a role, give them continuity to make the stories exciting.

Irene and Pablo live in a peasant house in the highlands. Pablo is older than his wife, for whom joy is the highest form of life, so the two face a terrible loss that ended with Gabriel, Pablo's only son. Irene convinces Pablo to travel to the coast, to a city abandoned by humanity and numb in the ups and downs of oil extractivism that has turned it into an artificial ruin. Irene knows that love cannot do everything, but that the dead must be buried. In his duel, Pablo succumbs to drunkenness and his white hair flutters in the wind. Irene is sustained by the strength of her unconditional love towards whom she no longer wants anything. The two characters travel their strange path towards liberation from suffering through love and renunciation. In Andrea Mejía's second novel, the recurrences of her prose surprise us again, and leave us with the feeling that she is a writer who has known, like few others, to observe the correspondence between our emotions and nature. Poetic, splendid, Before the sea closes the roads, she manages to persuade us that language is the true creator of the divine.

The mountains, the perpetual fog, the people who survive in those landscapes, hideout and refuge at the same time, are some of the protagonists of this collection of stories that transport the reader to Colombia, to a part of the forgotten country, the countryside, inhabited for an oneiric universe of its own. Nature crosses all its pages, and this and the objects found in it reveal the mystery of the world around us. An invisible and deep thread is the reflection of the (un)quietude that runs through all of us.

Andrea Mejía dissects in these stories, in which childhood, death and memories also appear, the geography and reality of a broken nation that, despite its tragedies, always tries to rebuild itself. The inhabitants that populate this book give life to a truth that governments try again and again to bury. Thanks to the voice of Andrea Mejía, her stories remain in the imagination of readers, who make them their own on both sides of the Atlantic.

The perfect con of a dying man will show us who, on the threshold between faith and despair, is the real deceiver. The stories in this book by Miguel Mendoza Luna reveal characters and places such as the place without a name and without memory, in the year 2984, where the books have been eliminated; or the rooms of an insane asylum where a student becomes obsessed with María, the woman's name and the novel; the luxury trend in which an old writer plays the role of judge and intellectual author of a crime that is about to happen; a badly inhabited Bangkok by a man who looks like Kurt Cobain and is being chased by the mob; or the mirror that allows a woman looking for her son to enter the afterlife. These stories are, above all, a tribute to the writers who made us fall in love with reading. From classics like Agatha Christie, George Orwell, Charles Dickens or Clarice Lispector to contemporaries like Haruki Murakami and Lucia Berlin. In these pages, the dystopia, the epic of the defeated, the glimpses of loneliness, the lucidity of the supernatural and the irrepressible destiny will captivate us and connect us with universal literature, thanks to the intelligent writing of a contemporary author who dialogues with your time.

In his second novel, Gilmer Mesa recreates the story of his maternal family that occurred in Las Travesías, a farm founded by the narrator's great-grandparents in the Antioquia region. This family saga is a story about the violence of the 20th century in Colombia, and it also shows the violence that occurs in private, which contributes to fueling a spiral of daily envy and revenge. With the fluid and heartbreakng writing that characterizes him, Mesa reflects on the degradation that war brings. Behind the harshness of the violence appears a drive of inherited hatred that determines the fate of the characters, who are forced to survive in the midst of pain and loss, with love and loyalty as the only possible handles.

Literary texts are presented as a window to explore the environmental dimension of the human condition; For this reason, aimed at exploring several key themes of the canon of jungle narratives, this book studies its images and representations in Latin American novels and stories from the period 1905-2015, whose action is located in the Amazon—a Latin American jungle environment par excellence—, but also in the Paraná basin, the humid forests of Central America and other relevant environments. Although the methodology privileged the tools of ecocriticism, political ecology, and environmental ethics, it also draws on recent developments in ecological philosophy, tropical forest biogeography, environmental history, and cultural anthropology. Thus, through this multidisciplinary approach, Ríos que cantan, Weeping trees opens a scenario of fruitful dialogue between literary criticism and other areas of the natural, social and human sciences, to provide ideas and points of view that contribute to the construction of a different relationship, symbiotic and not simply extractive, between the human societies and natural ecosystems.

"Estudio de las Pérdidas" each note alludes to an evocation of the land of childhood, the orchard, the field. Here is a look at simple people, at their daily biographies, at their transparencies. The author has tried to be faithful, in this writing, to the life lived, to his ancestors, to the countless losses. A calm contemplation prevails, in harmony with the environment. The events are described under the conception of a stable world through which beings pass as part of an endless cycle. The book provokes a journey between short prose and aphorism. The meticulous work with the word is consistent with a fidelity to the look and listening.

"Vivir en la Orta Orilla" reflects the crisis of our time: with modern warfare, savage imperialism-capitalism and the impositions of totalitarian governments. Among the most painful processes experienced in recent history are the de facto regimes during the 1970s in the Southern Cone that left thousands of victims disappeared, tortured, murdered, imprisoned and exiled. The recovery of the memory of these events has been particularly painful. Among the writers, many of them were imprisoned, murdered and others had to go into exile in countries such as the United States, Germany, France, Mexico, Spain and Venezuela.

A new imagined kingdom examines the discursive framework of the political project of the Elegies of illustrious men of the Indies (1589-1601), a history of the conquest of the Caribbean and what is now Colombia, Panama and Venezuela, written by the erudite writer , rigorous historian and clergyman, Juan de Castellanos (Alanis, Spain 1522- Tunja 1607). The chronicler-poet uses the classical and Renaissance literary legacy and an extensive historical documentary collection to present the first conquerors as a suitable martial elite, destined to govern the New Kingdom of Granada and deserving of the encomiendas and other privileges. In the poem, the conquistadors are heroes made through a savage celebration of the destruction of indigenous America,

"El Hacedor de Palabras" follows Gabo, an eight-year-old boy who loves soccer and has an above-average IQ, hatches a master plan. He will run away from home before the acute couple crisis that his adoptive parents are going through explodes and he, as in past times, is left without support. He falling eternally, into the void.

To this end, Gina, her best friend from El Liceo Juan de Segovia, the school for genius children that she entered in January of that year, has offered to hide it in the dollhouse. A tiny cabin located in the outer garden of her own residence.

However, the morning Gabo sets out on his journey to that address, everything changes due to a robbery. Not only because during the hours that follow he is left adrift in the south-south-south of the city, where at first glance it is impossible to locate himself, but because from that moment on he begins to discover inviolable secrets of life. Like, for example, that forgetting is the only truthful resource available to memory, as well as that reality is an artificial construct, a structured value system, which man has built for man from an element circumscribed to the order of dreams: the word.

Inspired by the desire to keep the memory of Colombia alive, Marbel Sandoval presents the trilogy Conjuro contra el forgetful, narrated through the voices of women affected by violent events that mark their lives and those of their families. In the arm of the river, inspired by the Vuelta Acuña massacre in the 80s, it presents us with two girls whose friendship is interrupted by the trip of one of them to her family's farm, where she will be found by the tragedy. Joaquina Centeno is the story of a woman who for thirty years has not given up in the search for her youngest son, disappeared by the state after witnessing a murder. In Las Brisas, Rosa talks with her employer every Monday and brings her family history back to life through the life of her mother, a woman accompanied by death and misery. "Corruption, Social inequity, violence and misery are approached with depth and simplicity by the Bogota journalist and writer Marbel Sandoval Ordoñez, who executes a balanced narrative counterpoint with remarkable development.

The subject in crisis evades reality, escapes from the present and takes refuge in memory. In the narrative of the Valle del Cauca writer Fernando Cruz Kronfly, the main character is not aware of himself, his self flees, and he only has one chance of being in past images. We take as reference some postulates of existentialism described by the German philosopher Martin Heidegger in his work: Being and time (1993). We postulate that in Cruz Kronfly's novels: The Dream Work (1984), The Liberator's Ash (1987) and Gardel's Caravan (1999), the subject in crisis evades reality and euphemizes his calamities in the symbolic space of reality. memory, for this we rely on Gilbert Durand's Anthropological Structures of the Imaginary. We show that in Cruz Kronfly's novels this element is vital because it creates the space of the subject in crisis and breaks with the linearity of time. In addition, the main characters make a journey that will culminate in death. This shows that the subject in crisis wants to escape from the melancholy and the existence that overwhelms him.

"Playas en la Costa Caribeña Colombiana" reconstructs the emergence and transformation of several beaches of what is now called the Colombian Caribbean, as tourist beaches, between 1950 and 1990. Through an analysis of journalistic and audiovisual archives and narratives, we unravel the beach chronotope, taking Prado Mar and Puerto as a focus. Colombia, in Barranquilla; Tolú and Coveñas, in Sucre; El Rodadero, in Santa Marta, and Spratt Bay and Sound Bay on the island of San Andrés. The chapters that make up this book are woven around two interconnected lines. First, the history of each beach through the fictional lens, mainly. And, second, the ways in which each writer or artist imagined, foresaw and glossed over that particular history and, in this way, inserted themselves into a debate about the local presence and the presence of the tourist, the polarization between the center and the "coast".

The settlers arrived with their customs and traditions, and this cultural heritage was enriched by the new life in these territories. When the work of uprooting the jungles began and the settler faced the tropical forest; a rich popular mythology was born; the nightly gatherings around the stove allowed the creation of myths, horrors and legends that arose from real events, but appeared wrapped in the clothing of popular fantasy.

In addition, the settlers traveled with their religious and political ideology and with their own mythology. New myths and versions of them enriched those that the settlers had brought and were mixed with what already existed in the areas they were colonizing: in the indigenous communities of Supía, Riosucio, Quinchía and Anserma; in the mining area of Marmato; in the black region of Guámal; in the black enclaves of the Risaralda Valley and in the segregated territories of Antioquia, Tolima and Cauca. In this way a richer and more complex culture arose.

This miscegenation produced during the periods of occupation of the space, helped the region's identity process and as a result particularities emerged that make us different and that in turn enrich the national.

How does someone become a writer? Were the members of Tintaviva members from the moment they achieved the first good text, the first solvent story? Or is the publication of this book the threshold to put on the title, now that its texts reach readers? These are questions that each of these authors will have to answer individually, referring to that clearly understand what it is they want to become, which Gardner proposes. Whatever happens, I hope they keep the momentum of these first texts, the desire to be trying, failing, achieving, writing. Something dies the moment we believe it to be eternal. A similar idea was held by Maurice Blanchot, the literary critic, who in The Writing of Disaster reached a very different conclusion from Gardner's: " What Schlegel says about philosophy is true for writing: only without ever being one can one become a writer; From the moment you are a writer, you are no longer."

246. Abadía Quintero, Carolina . POR UNA MERCED EN ESTOS REINOS: REDES, CIRCULACIÓN ECLESIÁSTICA Y NEGOCIACIÓN POLÍTICA EN EL OBISPADO DE POPAYÁN, 1546-1714. Bogotá: Universidad del Rosario, 2021. 521p., maps, photos, tables, graphics, indices, wrps. New. Paperback. ISBN: 9789587847239.

"Por Una Merced en Estos Reinos" allows the reader to establish a link between the Bishopric of Popayán, as well as its prelates and prebends, and other broader spaces of monarchical power. It questions whether it should continue to define itself as a low-profile bishopric or if it is possible to identify a decisive role in the South Indies. Thus, these reflections present the ways in which the members of the Hispanic cathedral elites devised family, political and social strategies to achieve ecclesiastical promotion, and, then, by determining the relationships between subject-conflict networks -circulations in a bishopric like that of Popayán, will lead to understand the implicit connection between the network of Indian cathedrals in the period from 1546 to 1714, to understand the mediation of the Royal Patronage in ecclesiastical promotions and in the tensions between powers and, finally, to demonstrate how the circulation of a bishop or a prebendary connected attitudes, clienteles, devotions, interests, projects, negotiations and friendships between the elites ."

Much of the contemporary rhetorical work has been interested in the study of the moving image, which has brought an understanding of cinema as a language, beyond the important findings made by semiotic work. This book is an effort to meditate on the expressive forces of cinema through a journey that begins with current rhetoric to lead to the fields of film history. For this reason, it explores the idea of rhetorical figures, originally intended for verbal language, inside the big screen, both in terms of visual inscriptions and narrative forms. With this comes the idea that meaning operates as a deviation from an apparent basic discourse, as a force capable of modifying any kind of grammar.

It takes sides by analyzing four rhetorical figures within the framework of four great periods of cinema. It is expected to highlight the rhetorical capacity of these figures to operate as a symptom of the aesthetic style that each era adopts. To this extent, the reader will be able to review the cinematographic nature of metaphor, allegory, symbol and metonymy within the scope of four periods that encompass the history of the seventh art: classical cinema, baroque cinema, modern cinema and postmodern cinema, respectively. In each case, the figure is studied in situ, thanks to the analysis of a set of representative films of the corresponding period in order to show how any attempt to grammaticalize the seventh art fails in the face of creative work. Basically, the figures break with the naturalized use that is acquired when a systematization of semiotic-narrative findings is achieved. To this extent, without it being the end of the book, the history of cinema can well be thought of in another way, it can well be thought from the springs of language, from its rhetorical configuration.

"Repertorio de la Desesperación" examines a set of cases of suicide and suicide attempts that occurred in the New Kingdom of Granada during the eighteenth century and part of the nineteenth, to understand, from their study, not only the perception, the reactions, the explanations, the punishments to which voluntary death was the object, but also to reveal the social dynamics, the religious, legal and moral contexts where the act of self-destruction was inscribed at that time and place. The analysis of this repertoire of cases helps to understand the collective attitudes towards the phenomenon. The reflexive exploration of these events also makes it possible to discover a series of aspects of New Granadan society that do not appear very often in colonial historiography.

During much of the 20th century, the Arhuaco indigenous people of the Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta suffered a process of territorial, political, economic and cultural dispossession perpetrated mainly by Capuchin settlers and missionaries. As a strategy to fight colonization, various members of the Arhuaco group developed a dialogue with different entities of the Colombian State in order to publicize the abuses, dispossession and demand the intervention of national and regional authorities. "Estrategias de Lucha Contra el Despojo" seeks to expand what is understood as a strategy of struggle and to show that this group and its claims were affected by particular historical conditions, through the analysis of the transformations and continuities of the content and the arguments of the claims presented by the Arhuacos in the dialogue with the State over 56 years.

"Historia y Nación" presents an analysis of the development of the historical discipline in Colombia and explains how the writing of history was consolidated in the 19th century around the desire to achieve national unity; it describes how the construction of the national past advanced a good stretch of the 20th century supported by the need to achieve the desired "development"; then reflects on the crises of the paradigms at the end of the eighties that had served the writing of history as fundamental references, and concludes with an analysis of the way in which the need and transcendence of revising the foundations of the nation flow. that the construction of the past in Colombia had accepted without analyzing or questioning. The text makes a critical balance of a global nature that ponders both the methodological factors and the various political uses of the writing of history within the Colombian social and cultural sphere of the 20th century. It offers the possibility of putting into perspective the novel production of historical texts today, where the urgency of coining new categories that could facilitate a better understanding of Colombian historical processes is perceived.

This book is aimed at anyone who is interested in a comparative look at the aesthetic narratives of memory about historical events of societies with a past linked to war. Thus this reading is suitable for those whose area of research is literary studies, memory and/or law. The author, whose training is that of a lawyer who later earned a doctorate in Hispanic Language and Literature, proposes to study memory from two perspectives: one, from the fight for rights (truth, justice and reparation) that activates a political-national and transnational legal; another, from the novel, a format through which fiction is made from the memory of a conflictive past. The text affirms that there is an interaction between socio-legal discourses and the literature of memory. The author puts literary texts by the Spanish author Rafael Chirbes into dialogue with those of the Colombian writer Laura Restrepo, exposes the production context of the respective works and distinguishes that the aesthetic narratives of the memory of the violent past written by each of the authors combine interdiscursively the languages of history, law and culture to which each of the authors belongs. The author affirms that the work of the Colombian as well as that of the Spanish author articulate, in very different ways, the fiction of memory about historical-political events that are discussed in the respective national public arena, as well as in the transnational sphere.

*"De Damnificados a Víctimas" analyzes the category of "victim" in Colombia during the different cycles of violence between 1946 and 1991. It aims to historicize the emergence of the "victim" and its variants (damaged, exiled and disappeared) with respect to the national context, the dynamics of violence and how it is interpreted and narrated. How have the people affected by the violence in the history of Colombia been socially defined? In what way was the population affected by the violence transformed into an interest of state policy? What actions should be taken towards those "damaged" by the violence? These are some of the questions that the book answers, recognizing that legislation in different historical periods gives very similar answers. It reflects on how the effects of violence were included in the political agenda since the "Bogotazo" and the Bipartisan Violence. It relates how the "damaged" became the "victim" subject to political and administrative intervention. It identifies the moments of construction as a public problem, the process that led the State to consider it necessary and legitimate to intervene. It warns of the place of the subject affected by violence in government speeches and actions, the negotiation and contentious processes around their characterization, "rehabilitation" and reparation. The absence of ghostly adventures in my vigils could have led me to the easy –and irrational– attitude of denying their existence. As far as I know, there are ghosts that do not recognize the existence of human beings, possibly for the same reason, because they have never seen an individual of our species. There may be the rare case of ghosts that accept the existence of human beings and do not manifest themselves to them simply out of fear. The history of ghosts can be recounted according to the prevailing religions, according to the customs of each era, according to the philosophers. You can mention the way scientists have treated ghosts (perhaps not taking into account that there were already many ghosts before the first scientist existed), and one gets to the point that, Ghosts having always been present in the oral tradition of all peoples and having supplied these narratives to the greatest classics, the most appropriate territory of ghosts is literature. To begin with, no one there is going to ask them if they really exist, or anything like that. And what literature does is give them a role, give them continuity to make the stories exciting.

"Sometidos a Esclavitud" contributes to the study of Atlantic history in which the enslavement of millions of Africans was one of the main factors that generated and promoted the development of the modern world. The formation of commercial networks, trading companies and private businesses helped to connect worlds and make them interdependent. Along with merchandise, individuals and products, ideas and traditions traveled that weaved Atlantic history. In it, enslavement, the enslaved and Afro-descendants were and are prominent parts, as shown by its present legacy of American cultures. These studies of the work are added to investigations that, from different countries, projects, research groups and approaches, are being carried out on a subject as rich, diverse and complex as Atlantic slavery. The temporary space that the chapters cover extends in time as did the trade and the slave system. The same happens with the territories affected by this phenomenon.

Criminal organizations in Medellin and Envigado are not limited to committing crimes, they also regulate the social order of the territories they control. These structures are made up of two or more bands, which are divided into combos. The latter are in charge of exercising the role of solving security and coexistence problems, which has a lot of support among the community since their responses can be much faster and "effective" than those of the government. This situation undoubtedly weakens the legitimacy of the State in the neighborhoods. Thus, this case study with an ethnographic approach explores —through immersions, interviews, testimonies and hiphop musical verses— this phenomenon. And to get closer to its understanding, on which the existing literature does not delve,It is based on the theory of the process of civilization of Elías, the thesis of spontaneous amalgamated orders of Dávila, the typology of social order of Arjona, the exegesis of legitimization of Habermas and Duyvesteyn, and the current of legal pluralism.

Opinion columns are considered a fleeting genre whose validity is subject to the periodicity of the medium in which they are published. The 154 columns published in "Pensar El País: Conflicto, Democracia, Cultura y Paz" appeared in the Cali newspaper El País since May 1998, were written with the intention of going against the grain of this trend. Although almost all of them were built taking a particular situation as a reference, they aspire to become small essays with a vocation for permanence in time. They seek to identify and recover in each specific case a problem of reflection, of a general nature, that goes beyond the situation that serves as a starting point. In addition, they have been written as a way to carry out a pedagogy of democracy, in all its nuances: recognition of conflict and difference, control of the use of power, human rights, culture and peace. The essay "Democracy: an indefinite promise of equality", which appears as the Book Presentation, illustrates in detail the intellectual background from which the problems involved in each of the texts are deciphered. The reader will judge whether these two objectives have been met.

*The novel by the Caribbean writer Jamaica Kincaid, "A Little Place", serves as the pretext for "Teorizando Desde los Pequeños Lugares". The small places to which we refer are not geographical, despite the fact that they start from a given territoriality, but are above all political, places from which a subjectivity/intersubjectivity is constituted, a historical identity (not substantialist). They are places where the historical background of memory acts in the present as a pedagogical element and as a tool for liberation; as the possibility of thinking about other ways of existing that are not the ones that coloniality tries to impose in its apparently overwhelming display: who are we? Where are we talking from? Thus, the places trace the routes for us to be able to reflect from the coordinates that Fanon delineated when thinking about the damned of the earth. In this book, and trying to generate a symmetrical dialogue from small places or, as others have said, from the global south, we have selected Latino (and) American authors who are thinking about the issues of race, class, discrimination, violence, exclusion or the same ways of thinking or structuring our knowledge. "Políticos y Militares en Colombia" analyzes two events in the country's recent history in which political instability and institutional deterioration reached their greatest expression: the seizure of the Palace of Justice by a terrorist cell of the guerrilla group M-19 in November 1985 and the links of the political class with drug trafficking that led to the scandal of "Process 8000" between 1994-1997. In addition, it studies why in Colombia, at the moments that seemed most propitious for the Military Forces to assume control of political power, there were no military coups or attempted coups and, on the contrary, an electoral democracy was maintained.

"Anatomía Heterodoxa del Populismo" shows, on the one hand, that, under certain circumstances, populism favors democratic consolidation, since it stimulates citizen participation; on the other, that it tends to have greater effects in unconsolidated democracies, given that in developed systems populism seems to be limited to a merely electoral strategy. In this case, through a documentary review, a conceptual analysis of populism and a series of interviews that are specified in the document, the phenomenon in question shows fundamental aspects about the current situation of a democracy that, otherwise, would go unnoticed. The exploration of the Ecuadorian case, being a state with a broad populist tradition, allows us to reach conclusions that not only help to understand its reality as a nation-state, but they can be applied to other countries that seem to have succumbed to the populist temptation. To achieve this goal, the book is divided into two parts: the first analyzes the main conceptual and theoretical references related to democratization and populism, and the second emphasizes the link between populism and democratic consolidation in the Ecuadorian case with an emphasis on the Citizen Revolution.

"Las Incomodidades de Vivir en Riesgo" answers the question: what are the effects that the implementation of the resettlement policy has generated, after the declaration of non-mitigatable risk, taking into account the multiple conditions for which the inhabitants of the Yopal neighborhood can be considered "vulnerable" in use me? Then, it seeks to show that the current resettlement policy in the city of Bogotá reduces the situation of vulnerability to a purely physical issue (that is, the location of the dwelling and its structural conditions), without taking into account the multiple factors that could have generated it.

Three cases are the transversal column of this book and it is through them that the history of the Yopal neighborhood of Usme is told, of the migrants of rural origin who arrived in the city of Bogotá in the second half of the last century, as well as of the La Independencia Popular Housing Organization.

Colombia knows, in the first decades of the 20th century, a profound modernizing transformation. Spatial physiognomy, productive relationships, types of knowledge, forms of socialization, subjectivities, among others, experience transformations never seen before. These are transformations in which the Catholic Church assumed a proactive behavior, specifically in the social field. This book analyzes in detail the articulation that the Catholic Church made between knowledge and power during the country's modernization process. Strategy that eventually turned it into one of the constitutive forces of the social in Colombia and one of the political competitors for the government of men.

"Naturaleza y Ambiente, Dos Categorías que se Enfrentan" seeks to establish a dialogue between different researchers who work with native peoples —Tikuna, Uitoto and Muisca— and who, from their particular objectives, reflect on the tensions between nature and the concept of environment derived from modernity. Nature, from the perspective of these peoples, has a holistic character: the human being is an extension of it, receives and offers in a constant, integrated and balanced relationship. For its part, the environment is dual in nature: nature and culture are separated, since human beings know, control and dominate nature through the scientific method and the development of technology.

*Opinion columns are considered a fleeting genre whose validity is subject to the periodicity of the medium in which they are published. The 154 columns published in "Pensar El País: Conflicto, Democracia, Cultura y Paz" appeared in the Cali newspaper El País since May 1998, were written with the intention of going against the grain of this trend. Although almost all of them were built taking a particular situation as a reference, they aspire to become small essays with a vocation for permanence in time. They seek to identify and recover in each specific case a problem of reflection, of a general nature, that goes beyond the situation that serves as a starting point. In addition, they have been written as a way to carry out a pedagogy of democracy, in all its nuances: recognition of conflict and difference, control of the use of power, human rights, culture and peace. The essay "Democracy: an indefinite promise of equality", which appears as the Book Presentation, illustrates in detail the intellectual background from which the problems involved in each of the texts are deciphered. *"La Saga del Narcotráfico en Cali 1950-2018" offers a particularly original and detailed analysis of both the urban and rural dynamics of drug trafficking networks. The great mutations are clearly highlighted: from marijuana to cocaine, from the importation of raw materials from Peru and Bolivia to the control of national production, from laboratories to the organization of export circuits, from the management of foreign markets. , the North American market in the first place, to the progressive dependence on Mexican organizations that not only seize access to the United States but also interfere in other phases of transportation. As the author points out, Cali's relationship with drug trafficking is neither new nor unique, but it does have something unique when compared to other cities.In these organizations, the little use of violence stands out, the absence of large armies of hired assassins, the lack of links between the first drug traffickers and the poorest sectors of the city, and their interest in integrating into the local social order through relationships with political, social and economic elites. Sabotage has become one of the strategies of various contemporary practices, among which, without a doubt, art stands out. To this extent, artists sabotage classical art, the hegemonic forms of the present, the politically correct. The cinema, not without difficulty, has tried to win a place in the canon of fine arts, but, more importantly, it has questioned the very meaning of the artistic. It is in this field that this book is inscribed. However, this is not a defense of cinema as art. It seeks, in another route, to sabotage the concepts that, over the years, have been central to defining this unique medium. To this extent, reflection moves to the aesthetic field which, put lightly, is broader and less pretentious than the artistic. Therefore, we believe, cinema as an art form ends up sabotaged. The cinema appears, then, interpreted from a modification of the concepts with which the tradition of film studies has operated. From an apparently semantic change, the operation of the so-called seventh art in the 21st century is reviewed, whose inclination in terms of operation directs it to the digital universe.

Much of the contemporary rhetorical work has been interested in the study of the moving image, which has brought an understanding of cinema as a language, beyond the important findings made by semiotic work. This book is an effort to meditate on the expressive forces of cinema through a journey that begins with current rhetoric to lead to the fields of film history. For this reason, it explores the idea of rhetorical figures, originally intended for verbal language, inside the big screen, both in terms of visual inscriptions and narrative forms. With this comes the idea that meaning operates as a deviation from an apparent basic discourse, as a force capable of modifying any kind of grammar.

It takes sides by analyzing four rhetorical figures within the framework of four great periods of cinema. It is expected to highlight the rhetorical capacity of these figures to operate as a symptom of the aesthetic style that each era adopts. To this extent, the reader will be able to review the cinematographic nature of metaphor, allegory, symbol and metonymy within the scope of four periods that encompass the history of the seventh art: classical cinema, baroque cinema, modern cinema and postmodern cinema, respectively. In each case, the figure is studied in situ, thanks to the analysis of a set of representative films of the corresponding period in order to show how any attempt to grammaticalize the seventh art fails in the face of creative work. Basically, the figures break with the naturalized use that is acquired when a systematization of semiotic-narrative findings is achieved. To this extent, without it being the end of the book, the history of cinema can well be thought of in another way, it can well be thought from the springs of language, from its rhetorical configuration.

"Violencias que Persisten" accounts for the main forms of violence that refuse to disappear, despite the attempted peace in Havana. Throughout the chapters, several of the most disturbing questions that, today, haunt the public conscience of the country are investigated in depth: Why can't we build peace? What is fueling the Colombian violent conflict that returns and is recycled, no matter what peace initiatives stand in its way? In these pages a series of common knots intersect: homicide and violence; illicit economies and territorial control; and the new armed, political or criminal actors.

*The novel by the Caribbean writer Jamaica Kincaid, "A Little Place", serves as the pretext for "Teorizando Desde los Pequeños Lugares". The small places to which we refer are not geographical, despite the fact that they start from a given territoriality, but are above all political, places from which a subjectivity/intersubjectivity is constituted, a historical identity (not substantialist). They are places where the historical background of memory acts in the present as a pedagogical element and as a tool for liberation; as the possibility of thinking about other ways of existing that are not the ones that coloniality tries to impose in its apparently overwhelming display: who are we? Where are we talking from? Thus, the places trace the routes for us to be able to reflect from the coordinates that Fanon delineated when thinking about the damned of the earth. In this book, and trying to generate a symmetrical dialogue from small places or, as others have said, from the global south, we have selected Latino (and) American authors who are thinking about the issues of race, class, discrimination, violence, exclusion or the same ways of thinking or structuring our knowledge. "Seguridad y Narcotráfico en el Caribe" is the result of the development of the line of thought "Security and drug trafficking", which included the participation of academics, experts and representatives of different institutions and public and private entities convened to discuss the issue in the Greater Caribbean region with emphasis in the Colombian Caribbean, especially in its insular orbit, made up of the Archipelago department of San Andrés, Providencia and Santa Catalina. In this sense, a common problem in the Caribbean countries was discussed, which at present has taken on an unprecedented magnitude in Latin America, especially in the Central American countries, that is, the various social and political havoc caused by the growing violence associated with the drug trafficking.

"Políticos y Militares en Colombia" analyzes two events in the country's recent history in which political instability and institutional deterioration reached their greatest expression: the seizure of the Palace of Justice by a terrorist cell of the guerrilla group M-19 in November 1985 and the links of the political class with drug trafficking that led to the scandal of "Process 8000" between 1994-1997. In addition, it studies why in Colombia, at the moments that seemed most propitious for the Military Forces to assume control of political power, there were no military coups or attempted coups and, on the contrary, an electoral democracy was maintained.

The object of the research is to address the question of the decolonial political subject in the context of the Citizen Revolution of Ecuador (2007-2017). In the historical framework, the decolonial struggles of Ecuador are identified as antecedents for the formation of a bloc and a counter-hegemonic project in order to overcome neoliberalism. The thesis analyzes, from a Gramscian perspective of the expanded State, the process of recovery of the State by Alianza PAIS (Patria Altiva i Soberana), pointing out both the decolonial potentials (in the political, economic, social and cultural dispute ), such as the authoritarian and (neo) colonial features of the Rafael Correa regime. Second, the economic process and some public policies implemented by Alianza PAIS are analyzed, that consolidate the system of capitalist accumulation through modernization. Finally, the question of the decolonial political subject is analyzed, for which a definition is elaborated, its importance for social transformation is exposed and its relationship with the governments of Rafael Correa is configured.

The text recognizes that within the political discourse in England in the 17th century, religion was used as an instrument to maintain power, through the irrational use of fear-fear, engendered by the church for the domination of subjects ( Commonwealth ). The reader will find how the struggle between Church and State focuses on examining who has the legitimate right to use power at their convenience. Then, if the power by divine jure falls to the monarch, direct representative of the State, he must ensure a rational use for the welfare of the subjects and the Leviathan State itself, which needs the obedience of citizens to develop its goals. However, if the power by divine iure falls on the Church, whose direct representative is the Pope in power, it will be used for his benefit, and this will help to keep him perpetually on the side of that institutionalization, which leads to instrumentalization. of religion in the perspective of the use of Hobbesian politics. However, where the balance of power that religion harbors leans, this will always be instrumentalized by whoever is in command of the governing institution: be it the State and its representatives, or the Church and its pastoral retinue.

"Anatomía Heterodoxa del Populismo" shows, on the one hand, that, under certain circumstances, populism favors democratic consolidation, since it stimulates citizen participation; on the other, that it tends to have greater effects in unconsolidated democracies, given that in developed systems populism seems to be limited to a merely electoral strategy. In this case, through a documentary review, a conceptual analysis of populism and a series of interviews that are specified in the document, the phenomenon in question shows fundamental aspects about the current situation of a democracy that, otherwise, would go unnoticed. The exploration of the Ecuadorian case, being a state with a broad populist tradition, allows us to reach conclusions that not only help to understand its reality as a nation-state, but they can be applied to other countries that seem to have succumbed to the populist temptation. To achieve this goal, the book is divided into two parts: the first analyzes the main conceptual and theoretical references related to democratization and populism, and the second emphasizes the link between populism and democratic consolidation in the Ecuadorian case with an emphasis on the Citizen Revolution.

Primera edición en inglés: Plan Colombia. U.S. Ally Atrocities and Community Activism

For more than fifty years, the United States supported the Colombian military in a war that cost over 200,000 lives. During a single period of heightened U.S. assistance known as Plan Colombia, the Colombian military killed more than 5,000 civilians. In Plan Colombia John Lindsay-Poland narrates a 2005 massacre in the San José de Apartadó Peace Community and the subsequent investigation, official cover-up, and response from the international community. He examines how the multibillion-dollar U.S. military aid and official indifference contributed to the Colombian military's atrocities. Drawing on his human rights activism and interviews with military officers, community members, and human rights defenders, Lindsay-Poland describes grassroots initiatives in Colombia and the United States that resisted militarized policy and created alternatives to war. Although they had few resources, these initiatives offered models for constructing just and peaceful relationships between the United States and other nations. Yet, despite the civilian death toll and documented atrocities, Washington, DC, considered Plan Colombia's counterinsurgency campaign to be so successful that it became the dominant blueprint for U.S. military intervention around the world.

Thinking and discussing "the populist question" today resembles the eternal work of Sisyphus: carrying the rock of reflection of populism over and over again, facing the unattainable slope of commonplaces. Like that of Sisyphus, ours is a labor—obviously—endless. For this reason, this book does not intend to settle or close the debate, but to lighten the rock of reflection a little; More than deciphering the nature of populism, we intend to think of it as an operative and productive analytical category for the study of particular historical-political processes such as Argentine Peronism and Colombian Gaitanism. And for these purposes, this collective book collects and offers different inquiries about a perspective on populism that we call "decentered". The first offset we propose, highlights the specific political experiences when talking about populism (in the plural) and distances itself from the archetypal models in an anomalous key produced with regard to two of them. The second places in the foreground the question about the role played by the processes of identity constitution and redefinition in Latin American populism. The third is related to a particular way of introducing the historical approach in the study of populisms, since it is not intended to search in the past for an original or essential moment of constitution of a popular identity, but to make visible, in the course of time, different moments of constitution of Peronism and Gaitanism; moments that certainly

*Food problems—and also the meanings of food and of the bodies that consume it—are not a reality given in advance, but the historical result of processes that involve local cultural traditions, scientific and epistemic transformations, technological developments, new ways of government over the social and the corporeal, as well as (increasingly global) industrial systems of food production, distribution and advertising. These processes in turn include a wide range of actors and institutions—both locally and internationally—with different theoretical perspectives, political agendas and economic interests. At the crossroads of the studies of science, technology and medicine and the social studies of food, The Hunger of Others is an effort to critically analyze the relationships between science, the State, and public policy in the processes of conceiving and managing health and food problems in Latin America throughout the last century. This book brings together academics from America and Europe who analyze the social construction of expert knowledge on nutrition in local contexts in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia and Mexico, and its articulations with international scientific networks and with state, bilateral and multilateral agencies, at the same time as time to make the food issue readable and manageable. The implementation of the resulting public policies is also explored through concrete programs and practices, as well as their contingencies and real scope, the power relations involved (traversed by issues of gender, race and class) and the agency of the people who are the object of intervention. As a whole, The Hunger of Others is an invitation to take into account the diversity of cultural, natural, political, economic and technological elements that make up our food worlds at specific times and places, and whose forms of management and improvement require comprehensive approaches. . and the construction of shared knowledge and practices among the actors involved.*

When a society goes through an internal conflict of violence or a war with the outside, it must carry out at least three tasks, in order to re-establish institutionality and guarantee the non-repetition of what happened: reparation for the victims and the damage, identification and punishment of those responsible and elaboration of the meaning of what happened. On the occasion of the signing of the 2016 peace agreements, Colombia is committed to these three processes. However, the experience in this regard has been very poor in the long history of the Colombian conflict. In order to learn from history and not repeat it, this book studies the way in which these three aspects were resolved in the case of the Violence of the 1950s, which confronted conservatives and liberals for twelve years or more.

Much research in Colombia has studied the suffering and violence produced by the armed conflict. Meanwhile, The photographs and their stories shows that, in some way, there has been another war: against women and children; often silent, invisible, but no less devastating for that. Hence, this book analyzes how suffering is constructed and produced, through three biographical cases about women from three different generations: grandmother, mother and daughter, and ethnographic work, based on the use of photographs as awakeners of memories and generators of stories. This also examines how belonging to three types of groups is affected: gender, social class and generation. The book also highlights the need to make visible the suffering of people who, Due to their class or gender condition, they have few opportunities to be heard, with the intention of breaking the silences that lead to the normalization of daily violence. Exposing these sufferings —so common, but so invisible— can be, hopefully, a first step to stop being complicit in them.

During the colonization processes in various territories of America, the destruction and worship of sacred images were two policies stipulated by the institutions of power to subdue communities and, in some cases, the colonized people adopted them as a mechanism of resistance. Without neglecting the differences between one policy and the other, the violent act against an image and its adoration share a belief in the power of the image: they are two sides of the same coin. "Destrucción y Culto" seeks to investigate these policies and see how they are intimately linked to processes of submission typical of an imperial and colonial policy. Based on various transatlantic case studies, draws a panorama rich in nuances that highlight the complexity of the visual culture of the 16th and 17th centuries in the territories of the Spanish Crown.
